A University Model is a hybrid model of education that blends traditional private or public schooling with homeschooling. Students attend classes on-campus a few days a week and complete coursework at home under the guidance of their parents, who serve as co-teachers. This model aims to leverage the strengths of both traditional and homeschooling approaches, providing students with a structured, yet flexible, learning environment.

Here's a more detailed look at the University-Model approach:

Hybrid Model:

Students spend a portion of the week in a central classroom setting with professional teachers and complete assignments and coursework at home under parental supervision.

Co-teaching:

Parents are actively involved in their children's education, serving as co-teachers and providing support for at-home learning.

University-Style Scheduling:

The schedule is often structured with students attending classes a few days a week and completing coursework at home on the remaining days, mirroring a university-style semester system.

Focus on Character and Discipleship:

Many University-Model schools emphasize character development and discipleship within a Christian framework.

Direct Parent Involvement:

Parents are actively involved in their children's education, reinforcing instruction provided by the school and supporting their learning at home
